FOUNDERS HOUSE · MASTERCLASS 1 · 20 NOVEMBER

Know Enough.

Bookkeeper, lawyer or ops hire: what does your business need now, and next?

THE IDEA

Founders don’t need to become the operations person. They need to know enough to know when to bring someone in, who, and what to ask.

Most founders think operations means process. Process is one part of it. I'll show them the whole picture, then give them two tests to run on their own business:

NOW

The house isn’t on fire.

I understand what’s happening, and the company can exist.

NEXT

If I stepped away, what breaks?

And where would we still need a person’s judgement?

Once a business has paying clients and comfortable runway, it needs a written plan, and every part of the business has to answer to it. That's my view, and two well-known Harvard Business Review models of how businesses grow back it: Churchill and Lewis, and Greiner.

WHAT I'LL COVER · 60 MINUTES

0–7	What operations actually is: eight parts, not just process
7–13	The Now and Next tests, and the point where a business needs a plan
13–37	People, finance and legal, followed through one fictional company: what good enough looks like, what changes at Next, and who could help, starting with the smallest step
37–39	“Can’t I just use AI?”
39–50	How to brief a specialist precisely, with a live rewrite
50–60	This week’s action, and questions

WHAT FOUNDERS LEAVE WITH

The Know Enough Map scored for their own business, one red area picked, and a four-part brief ready to send that week. It isn't advice: it shows them how to ask, not when they need a professional.

BEFORE THE SESSION

You’ll get the Know Enough Map 48 hours ahead. Score it for your own business, Now and Next, and bring it with you. There’s nothing to prepare beyond that, and nothing you share in the room leaves it.
